Controversial Questions to Ask Your Audience

Is the American dream dead?

Is America still the land of opportunity? With massive foreign debt, sky high unemployment and the scars of the GFC still clearly visible, recent reports indicate trust in US business and government has tumbled. Aleks knows that anyone in America can still live their dream with the correct psychological and emotional training. Will Americans learn how to believe in themselves and in America again?

How can the most depressed nation in the world have the most millionaires?

Aleks has examples that show the USA to have the most millionaires and also the highest level of depression in the world. Why is there such a contrast? Does the pursuit of wealth come at the ultimate price? US organizations lose over $51 billion dollars a year on depression related costs. Aleks knows the answer is related to a lack of emotional intelligence training but what does your audience think?

Are modern Americans too obsessed with themselves?

It could be argued that Americans are consumed with self-gratification. Massive consumer debt, so many reality shows of people seeking fame, huge cosmetic surgery costs, and a nation with well over 50% of people being overweight. But then why do US citizens give more to charity than any other nation?

Are you happier than your parents and will your kids be happier than you?

For over 40 years up until 2008, individual wealth in America increased exponentially and yet Depression increased tenfold and happiness stayed about the same. How do people define success and happiness? Parents tended to live in simpler times and numerous studies are indicating that modern children are becoming anti-social, overstimulated and unfocussed. Can success and happiness grow with each generation or has modern society spiralled out of control?
